News from KRH in Iraq

The King's Royal Hussars arrived in Iraq in the middle of April and have been slowly getting used to the heat and dust.

During the tour the regiment has been divided into three Squadrons - each with a different task and in a separate part of the country.

A Squadron is in the province of Maysan supporting the 1Bn The Staffordshire Regiment Battle Group in Al Amarah;

B Squadron is part of the Danish Battle Group based in Shaibah camp;

The Regimental Headquarters is moving to Camp Tallil in the North West province of An Nasiriyah and will set up a regional training centre for the Iraqi army.

Hundreds of projects are underway to improve life for the people of Iraq. Paid for with British and American money, overseen by British soldiers, and carried out by Iraqis themselves, schools, hospitals and health centres are being refurbished and built, the streets are being cleared of rubbish, many roads and bridges are being constructed, and public utilities such as water, sanitation and electricity are being improved.

"After knowing we were coming out here for over seven months and training intensively for three months, we are now glad to be getting on with the job," said Captain Charlie Smith, 28, the KRH Operations Officer. "We are aware of the dangers and conscious that it is certainly the most dangerous environment we have been in. But that has to be put in context - we are now two years on from the war and the vast majority of people in Iraq realise we are here to help."

Charlie will be moving with HQ Squadron to Camp Tallil, currently a large American base, to assist in training Iraqi soldiers. "We will train the trainers", he explained.

"During a 12-week course, Iraqi instructors will be taught how to train troops and they will eventually run the centre themselves. We will then mentor them and make sure they get enough support from us at the beginning".

In Al Amarah Trooper Gavin Harrison, 20, and Trooper Gareth Bebb, 19, are Challenger tank and Armoured 'Snatch' Landrover drivers. Every three days their troop is the Quick Reaction Force at five minutes notice to move. The Challengers patrol to the south of the town both day and night mainly to guard the camp and to remind the volatile population that they are there.

"When I heard we were coming to Al Amarah I was quite pleased because I knew that we would have a lot to do," said Gavin, "And that was made apparent from the beginning. I am very impressed with the facilities we have in the camp considering we are out in the sticks - we have a really comfortable TV room with DVD, games, two pool tables and table tennis and a good shop. We sleep in 12-man air-conditioned rooms and we have chipped in to buy TVs and fridges."

Gareth was surprised at how friendly the local people are when he patrols around the area. "It is a bit scruffy, but when we went to the outskirts of the town they were coming up and waving and saying "hello mister". I wasn't expecting that as I had heard what Al Amarah was like last year. I think the heat is going to be the worst thing."

Two Goats, a Fountain and 500 Staffords !

Two friendly goats are part of the health and safety measures being taken at Camp Abu Naji to ensure life is as comfortable and safe as possible for the 500 soldiers of 1st Battalion The Staffordshire Regiment who will be based there for the next six months. Once an old Iraqi Army base built by the British in the 1950s, many of the original buildings are still there, including a fountain in the centre of the courtyard that still works !

Surrounded by the famous Marsh Arab country, the weather is a few degrees cooler than further south, and there are many more trees and date palms. In some parts of the camp the grass can grow quite long, and so to prevent insects breeding, two goats have been purchased and spend happy hours keeping the grass short.

The Staffords, equipped with Warrior Armoured Fighting Vehicles, are working alongside a squadron from The King's Royal Hussars, No 1 Company Coldstream Guards and a Company from the Royal Regiment of Wales. Together they form the Staffords' Battlegroup, commanded by Lt Col Andrew Williams, which makes up the Maysan Task Force that operates over an area the size of Wales.

"We are here to create a stable and secure environment which will allow the Iraqis to continue towards a more prosperous democracy", Lt Col Williams said. "We have to undertake security operations to try and prevent the activities of the anti-Iraqi forces who are seeking to destabilise that process with acts of violence".

A vital part of that process is building up the effectiveness of the Iraqi security forces - the police, army, customs officers, border guards and so on - which will eventually lead to the withdrawal of the Multi National Force from Iraq. Security Sector Reform (SSR), as it is called, is one of the main priorities and British soldiers are now dedicated to training the Iraqi security forces at every level.

There are still tensions in Al Amarah, but there is a strong feeling that the terrorists come from outside the area, possibly from over the nearby Iranian border, because the general reaction when the Staffords go out is that the majority of people are friendly.

"It is pretty good when we go out there, very enjoyable," said Corporal Wez Dale, 21, a Warrior commander. "This is just the job we trained to do. Most people I see wave and stick their thumbs up and are friendly, a small minority turn their backs. But the majority try hard to speak to us in English after we have started to speak to them in Arabic."

Private Dael Williams, 23, spends up to 12 hours out on the ground some days. "We were trained to a very high standard before we came out here so we were prepared," he said. "But the heat was a real shock - nothing can prepare you for that until you get out here and start to acclimatise. I was surprised at the state of the place, but it has been a war zone for the last 30 years so it's to be expected."

Over the next few months the temperatures will rise to over 50 degrees centigrade. The soldiers carry bottles of water with them at all times and have all gone through an acclimatisation process help them cope with the heat.

Preparing for Flanders Fields ...

Anyone passing through Salisbury Plain and its environs can see surviving traces of the Great War. Some of the most obvious relate to the presence of people who came from distant lands to fight in support of the Empire's efforts. For example, at Bulford we have the chalk Kiwi carved into the hills by soldiers from New Zealand; at Codford and Fovant their Australian counterparts carved the Anzac cap badge which also survive to this day and, if one visited the small cemetery at Durrington, one could not fail to notice the graves of Australian troops - men who came to fight in a war but for whom death was a result of disease.

The Archaeologists at the Environmental Support Team of Defence Estates have established a project to find out more about the training of these Anzac troops on the Plain prior to their departure for the hell that was the 3rd Battle of Ypres - better known as 'Passchendaele'. For this project, the archaeologists have joined forces with the Australian War Memorial in Canberra and with Conservation Group members and local farmers, to examine the remnants of the camps and practice trenches used by these men. In particular, we are looking at the sites used by the Australian 3rd Division, citizen soldiers who volunteered to 'do their bit'.

The first phase of this project is to use an archaeological technique called a Resistivity Survey to establish what lies below ground - a technique familiar to those who watch the Time Team as 'Geophys'. Having looked at a number of hut bases at Codford, we got a team called Sagascan to evaluate an area of known Anzac Practice trenches close to the Bustard pub. We had aerial photographs, taken in the 1920s, from English Heritage and a schematic illustration from Canberra made by the Australians in the field, but wanted to see if our survey would show other elements of the trench designs of the Great War. The survey was a tremendous success revealing textbook elements of trench design, such as the 'island traverse', visible at the top of the survey, that did not show on our other sources of evidence.

In front of the area of the practice trenches was the location of a now filled-in mine crater. This is of great significance historically as it had been exploded by the Australians as part of their practice drills - to examine best methods of fortifying such features after their detonation. This practice was to prove essential in the Battle of Messines where, in 1917, a series of mines tore through the German front lines - the explosions being audible in England.

The mines and other elements of the trench system now host badger setts and the resulting spoil thrown out provides clues as to the lives of the troops 'in action'; Camp Coffee bottles, Bovril jars and an 'Anzora' bottle (function as yet unknown!) have been found in the earth. Perhaps this was not simply the contemporary detritus of nearby army camps used to fill the holes but material consumed by the troops on exercise. These finds are one of the real justifications of such work - providing anthropological evidence for the lives of soldiers during particular tasks. We hope there may be the possibility to excavate part of these trenches to find out more about the lives of these men who had travelled so far to fight.
